

Jorsal of Lauterbury at the Starrise Spire:

Greetings! While on an urgent errand I passed through a backwater thorp called Dawnton. By chance I met a farmer named who was showing off a strange stone idol he claimed to have found on his property. Like many in your organization, I have an interest in history and forgotten lore. Several features of this relic led me to believe it represented Pulura, an empyreal lord venerated ages ago in these parts. When I asked the man where he found it, he said that he had uncovered it while digging a root cellar into a hillside on his property. He mentioned there were larger pieces of worked stone there, too heavy to move in their current state but covered in strange writing. It distresses me to think about this simple farmer breaking up pieces of Sarkorian history to build a fieldstone wall. Due to circumstances beyond my control, I must not linger here in Mendev. I thought you might be able to investigate this matter—hopefully before the site is despoiled. I prefer to remain anonymous at this time. Again, the situation is complicated. Perhaps my loss will be your gain?

Most sincere regards,

-A Traveler